Economy control

THE EDITOR, Sir— Since people are individuals with unique and infinite tastes and desires, I've often wondered how Government—or prevented how a group of men—can any other economy without the individual's satisfaction of the individual's ever-changing desires this casting everyone in a mould cast by Government then to accept what Government believes we should have—instead of what we'd like to have.

An economy cannot be constructed, it can only be allowed to grow. It does not arise from legislative fiat—buy by people's needs and desires—and the nature of services imposed by the Government to satisfy them. No Government can foresee or provide for the infinite range of goods and services demanded by fickle personal preferences by trying to limit that their desires and him happy that what are unmet—this minute, makes the "Free and Market"—motivated by profit—and governed by the law of "Supply and demand" in free competition, can even attempt to satisfy the endless and ever-changing demand for a wide variety of things to meet their insatiable demands.

Men cannot violate nature's just laws with impunity. Nature is always supreme, and does not depend on majority opinions for her validity. She cannot be democratized. Either we obey—or face the chaos her penalties entail. That's the cause of our present dilemma!
